Abstract: In this study, friction stir welding (FSW) and Tungsten gas welding (TIG) processes were used to weld 5 mm thick Al-4.2Mg-0.6Mn-0.4Sc-0.1Zr alloy plates. The FSwelds and TIG welds were tested for mechanical properties (hardness, ultimate tensile strength, bending strength and impact strength) by means of vicker’s hardness machine, universal testing machine and impact test machine respectively. The strength of the base material was higher, compared to the strength of the FSW and TIG welded joints. The strength of the TIG welded joint decreased, compared to the strength of the FSW welded joint. The microstructure features were also observed for base material with the aid of metallurgical microscope and compared the same with the microstructures of FSW and TIG welded joints. FSW change the material strength due to fine-grain refinement in the stir zone in Al-4.2Mg-0.6Mn-0.4Sc-0.1Zr alloy and therefore FS welded joint exhibited 91.6% joint efficiency followed by the TIG welded joint of 69.8%.

KEYWORDS: Al-4.2Mg-0.6Mn-0.4Sc-0.1Zr alloy, Friction stir welding, Tungsten gas welding, mechanical properties

1 Introduction

In the present work, a 5xxx series alloy containing 0.4%Sc and 0.1%Zr is a new light weight material chosen for the investigation. This alloy usually contains aluminium (Al), magnesium (Mg), manganese (Mn) as principal alloying constituents and traces of other metals. These alloys are work-hardenable and can be easily drawn into any shape due to high formability, exhibits high ductility, good weldability, durability, and good finishing characteristics due to Al₃Sc, Al₃Mg₂, Mg₂Si, Al₆ (Fe, Mn) intermetallics [1-5]. The difficulty in adopting the traditional welding processes can be attributed mainly, new materials with low weld strength. A careful selection of the welding process for a given metal joining problem is, therefore, essential.

In the recent years, a new solid-state joining technique popularly known as Friction stir welding (FSW) was invented and patented by The Welding Institute (TWI), United Kingdom in the year 1991 [6]. The need of FSW was brought-out in the first paragraph for the reason that FSW was eco-friendly [7] and applicable for high strength to weight ratio materials and does not exhibit welding defects like porosity and hot cracks [8-16].

The present study focused to compare the FSW and TIG welding processes and their effect on mechanical and microstructure properties of Al-4.2Mg-0.6Mn-0.4Sc-0.1Zr alloy.

Abstract: The liver is a crucial and big organ in the human body, impacts the digestion system. Due to Liver diseases (LDs), so many deaths are occurred in worldwide that nearly 2 million deaths per year. The main LD complications are cirrhosis that 11th position in universal deaths, and others hepatocellular carcinoma and viral hepatitis that 16th leading position for global deaths. Fortunately, 3.5% of deaths are occurred due to LD. The capability of an ML approach for controlling LD can be identified through their factors, co-factors as well as complications respectively. In this research, we gather the personal and clinical information about 1460 individuals with 17 LD feature attributes include diagnosis class attribute from 2018 to 2020 with good questionnaire from north coastal districts of A.P., India hospitals, and reputed clinical centers. We apply machine learning (ML) models like Logistic Regression (LR), SVM with RBF kernel, Naive Bayes (NB), KNN, and Decision Tree (DT or Tree). As per the ML model's analysis, the DT model presents the superior classification accuracy that value is 0.9712 (97.12%) than other experimental ML models for the collected LD dataset. Our proposal model incremental hidden layer (HL) neurons ANN (Artificial Neural Network) solves LD detection with the highest classification and testing accuracy that the value is 0.999 (99.9%) at the 30 HL neurons.

1. INTRODUCTION

The weight of the liver is nearer 1 to 1.5 Kg. It occupies 1.5% to 2.5% of body mass. So, it is the elephant or the largest organ of the human body. It evolves with two types of cells that are non-parenchymal and parenchymal. The parenchymal are designated hepatocytes. The non-parenchymal cells are four distinct types including Liver Macrophages or Kupffer cells, Pit cells or killer cells, fat storing or stellate cells, and Sinusoid lining endothelial cells. Clinically, the liver disorders (LDs) distinguish obstructive (cholestatic), hepatocellular, and compounds of both or mixed. The hepatocellular LD is related to necrosis, viral hepatitis, alcoholic LD, liver injury predominantly, and so on. The cholestatic LD leads to cholestatic LDs, gallstone, alcoholic LDs, inhibition of bile flow, and so on. The mixed pattern LDs are related to the viral hepatitis cholestatic forms, drug-induced LDs, and injury of both hepatocellular, and cholestatic [1]. The main essential functionality of the liver is releasing the toxic elements and systematically digesting food. Most cases of Fatty Liver Disease (FLD) causes are alcohol abuse and viruses. So many LDs are there, but some of the LD cases like cirrhosis is the main cause of LD deaths. 20% to 40% of the population suffered from NAFLD (Non-alcoholic fatty liver disease) in developed and developing countries cause of hepatocellular carcinoma. The clinical and epidemiological studies with electronic records in medicine are very crucial to further studies [2]. Hepatitis A, B and C are the Liver Disorders (LDs) cause of viral infections [3]. In this, Hepatitis A is not dangerous than other hepatitis viral infections [4]. Hepatitis B and C are transmitted one to other cause of viral infections. It infects infected persons to health individuals in several ways that are blood transformation, sexual interactions, body fluids, sharing of reused medical equipment and so on [5], [6]. Due to a lack of proper treatment, more than 1 million people are dying every year from liver hepatitis C virus (HCV) diseases. The shape of the liver is differed as per the liver disease. Kohara et al. (2010) [7] researched on normal and abnormal shapes of the livers utilizing statistical and coefficients models. In this experiment, they choose 9 cirrhosis and 9 normal liver shapes hidden valued data and analyzed with Principal Component Analysis (PCA) model. They classified the liver shape components of first and second with feature vectors. As per analysis, identification of the cirrhosis liver by utilizing liver shape model. LD Progression happens in four stages that are fatty liver (FL), hepatitis, cirrhosis, and liver cancerous or carcinoma. The table 1 shows the details about each stage of LD, causes, and symptoms in detail. A medical and clinical symptomatic cycle attempts

(57) Abstract :

Stroke is the second leading cause of deaths and disabilities in humans across the globe as per WHO. After the stroke attack, giving treatment to the patient has its benefits. However, detecting the probability of stroke early is challenging phenomenon due to various medical factors. The current invention is meant for providing a novel machine learning based architecture that helps in early detection of probability of stroke using MRI imagery of given patient. From the brain MRI, the proposed framework extracts Apparent Diffusion Coefficient (ADC) and then subject ADC to infarct segmentation. It leads to efficient means of feature selection. The invention also takes Fluid Attenuated Inversion Recovery (FLAIR) from given MRI imagery and subject it to co-registration to arrive at more number of features. Therefore, it has combined features collected from ADC and FLAIR which makes it more comprehensive in feature selection. Such mechanism leads to efficient detection of brain stroke early which has potential to save lives. The features extracted are used to train machine learning (ML) classifiers such as Support Vector Machine (SVM) and Random Forest (RF). The training results in a knowledge model that is used for taking test MRI imagery and predict the probability of stroke of no stroke early. This invention benefits many stakeholders such as healthcare units, healthcare professionals, governments, health departments, researchers and academia.

Abstract—Context based semantic and syntactic information extraction using word embedding techniques are commonly used in natural language processing (NLP) activities. The current universal word embedding strategy for obtaining context-oriented word embeddings obtains word vectors largely from semantic and syntactic information in the context available, which results in a failure to capture essential sentiment information. Some techniques model words by grouping a large number of vectors based on context. Recent neural approaches, on the other hand, rarely focus on making the NLP algorithm's produced vectors readily available for consumption. Although some algorithms model sentiment data, they neglect specific phrases in certain fields. The sentiment classification performance will certainly degrade if the generic word vector is only implemented on the review oriented sentiment analysis when there is a change in emotion. This study provides a thorough analytical examination of the findings achieved while doing sentiment analysis with the Word2vec method in both similar domain and inter-domain aspects.

I. INTRODUCTION

Natural Language Processing(NLP) applications include sentiment analysis, document classification[14], clustering and many more. Every application needs text processing. As wide amount of information is available in the form of text, it is critical to obtain knowledge and apply it [1]. Before computers can interpret the text in its original form, they should be converted into vectors. Machine learning techniques are used by many businesses to automate processes, predictive modelling, knowledge finding, and comprehension using text data. One of the major issues is transforming original text data into a way that computational algorithms can use effectively. Word2Vec is one among such approaches that is used to build embeddings for words to represent text. In this study, we attempt to examine the word2vec technique from many perspectives.

II. LITERATURE SURVEY

The majority of text material on the internet is unstructured and difficult to handle [2]. There are several types of word embeddings that are presented here briefly. In the next part, we will go through these methods in further detail, with a focus on Word2Vec and its applications.

A. Frequency-based word embeddings

The frequency of appearance of words in the document is used in traditional or frequency-based word embedding algorithms. These approaches determine the significance of unique phrases by counting their existence and co-occurrence in a document. The BoW and the TF-IDF [3] are two widely used word embedding methods for converting text input to numerical vectors. Matrix factorization methods have always been essential for many NLP jobs [4]. Factorizing the word co-occurrence matrix is crucial because of two factors. It begins by producing word-embeddings [5, 6]. Second, it incorporates meaning representations that extend beyond single words to encompass hidden ideas. Examples include LSI [7], PLSI, and LDA.

B. Static Word Embeddings

A static word embedding function is used to transform each word to a vector. These embeddings are static since they are based on a fixed language. These vectors are dense and have a lower dimensionality when compared to the size of the vocabulary.

C. Contextual Methods

Many recent studies have focused on context related algorithms, such as Elmo, Bert, and XLnet. These approaches are founded on the notion that the substance of a word is disclosed in context that requires independent embeddings for every word in the given context.

D. Sentiment aware Methods

Techniques generating embeddings for words based on context are unable to distinguish words with the similar context but different polarities. Consider the terms "happy" and "sad." As the two phrases are frequently used in comparable contexts, they have been allocated that are nearer. In sentiment analysis, however, the terms "happy" and "sad" have opposing polarities should be separated.

III. WORD2VEC AND ITS APPLICATIONS

In its most basic version, Word2Vec [8] comprises of two distinct models. In Continuous Bag of Words model (CBOW), given all of the context words it guesses the target word. The skip-gram model is the second model. It guesses context words given a target word. Several applications have made substantial use of the Word2Vec paradigm in the

Abstract

We introduce the notion of generalized $F - H - \phi - \psi - \varphi$ - weakly contractive mappings and prove the existence of fixed points of such mappings in complete metric spaces. We draw some corollaries and provide examples in support of our main results. Our results extend the results of Cho [S. Cho, Fixed Point Theory Appl., 2018 (2018), 18 pages] and Choudhury, Konar, Rhoades and Metiya [B. S. Choudhury, P. Konar, B. E. Rhoades, N. Metiya, Nonlinear Anal., 74 (2011), 2116–2126] in the sense that the control function that we used in our results need not have monotonicity property.

1. Introduction

In 1922, Banach established a theorem which is known as the Banach contraction principle in metric spaces, which is the basic and fundamental result in fixed point theory. Because of its importance, many authors improved, generalized and extended the result either by defining a new contractive mapping in complete metric spaces or by investigating the character of the iterative sequence to provide the existence of fixed points in different ambient spaces, for more details we refer [1, 6, 14, 17, 18].

In 2008, Dutta and Choudhury[11] introduced a new generalization of contraction condition by using altering distance functions and proved the existence of its fixed points in complete metric spaces.

In 2009, Zhang and Song[21] introduced generalized φ -contraction for a pair of mappings and proved the existence of its common fixed points. In the same year, with the idea of the results of Dutta and Choudhury[11], Doric[10] established a fixed point theorem which is the generalization of the results of [21], for more details we refer [8, 9].

In 2012, Samet, Vetro and Vetro [20] introduced the notion of $\alpha - \psi$ -contractive and α -admissible mappings and proved the fixed point theorems in complete metric spaces. Further, using the notion of Transportation problem is applied for many different circumstances being scheduling, production, investment, plant location, inventory control, employment scheduling, and several methods. The aim of the fuzzy transportation problem is to resolve the transport schedule that minimizes the total fuzzy transportation cost while delightful the fuzzy supply and fuzzy demand limits. In view of this, a novel approach to optimize fuzzy transportation model by using trapezoidal approximations of L-R flat fuzzy numbers is proposed. A few generalized and modern properties of the trapezoidal and triangular approximations of L-R flat fuzzy numbers for parameters in fuzzy transportation problem is suggested. Numerical example is illustrated for the novel fuzzy transportation model.

ABSTRACT

1. INTRODUCTION

The transportation problem is an important application of Linear Programming Problem (LPP) models. The main view of mentioned concept is obtaining the minimal transportation cost of a product for gratifying the demands at destination, using the available supply at origin. The transportation problem can be used in different type of positions, such as scheduling, production, investment, plant location & inventory control. The transportation models are explained frequently with the inference that the transportation costs, supply and demands are stated accurately. However, for the transportation problem, the policy maker does not give correct data about the coefficients in most of the situations. If the data has ambiguity which means that, the corresponding coefficients can be developed by using fuzzy sets to determine the problem due to lack of precision and which approaches to fuzzy transportation problems.

Zadeh [1] developed the fuzzy set theory to discuss with the ambiguities. And in that uncertain information is transportation problem may be characterized by triangular and trapezoidal fuzzy numbers. Two examples are shown in trapezoidal approximation of fuzzy number to clarify such positions [2]. It developed the operator which gives some new properties. The concept of an approximation range of a fuzzy number was recommended [3]. Which fulfils two conditions and the opinion was correlated with an expected range of known fuzzy number. Two parameters, value and ambiguity were introduced to attain an authorized representation and to discuss with fuzzy numbers in policy – making problems [4]. The general arithmetic operations on real numbers are investigated using fuzzy fundamentals and these algorithms to be fitted for fuzzy set theory [5]. Fuzzy numbers on intervals was defined and shown to be additive with respect to addition of fuzzy range while only inequalities are satisfied and defined that the theory of interval – valued mean fuzzy numbers [6]. In [6], how the problem to take measure- theoretical assumptions into the branch of possibility theory was discussed. In [7], two metrics in space of fuzzy numbers are introduced and they are used to rank fuzzy numbers. Grzegorzewski [8] has explained the problem of an interval approximation of a fuzzy numbers and suggested to measure of distance between two different fuzzy numbers for a relevant new approximation period. The closest triangular approximation operator defending the expected range from the closest trapezoidal approximation operator preserving the expected interval is proposed [9]. The theory of trapezoidal approximations of a fuzzy numbers and the set of principles for nearest operators are developed [10], which are defending the expected interval. In [11], they revisited dedicated to trapezoidal approximations of a fuzzy number and they shown a correct explanation for the approximation operator perpetuating the expected interval. This operator maintains several properties are showed in [10]. After corrections they suggested all these parameters are firmly connected with the expected interval invariance norms. [12] was introduced the concept of an expected interval and an expected value of a fuzzy numbers. The expected value of this number is explained as the middle of the expected period and the expected range is defined as the expected value of irregular set of fuzzy number. In [13], proposed a process to Abstract. This paper proposes a new method to rank the parametric form of fuzzy numbers based on defuzzification. The defuzzification process use centroids, value, ambiguity and decision levels on fuzzy number developed from the parametric form of a generalized fuzzy number. The proposed method avoids reducing function to remove lower alpha levels and can overcome the shortcomings in some of the existing fuzzy ranking methods. The proposed method can effectively rank symmetric fuzzy numbers with the same core and different heights, fuzzy numbers with the same support and different cores, crisp numbers, crisp numbers having the same support and different heights, and fuzzy numbers having compensation of areas. A demonstration of the proposed method through examples and a comparative study with other methods in the literature shows that the proposed method gives effective results.

1. Introduction

A real-world system that we deal with always has some uncertainty associated with it. This uncertainty will be in the form of vagueness, imprecision, ill-defined and doubtful data. As fuzzy numbers are suitable for representing vague and uncertain values, they have been studied and elaborated on by various researchers. While using fuzzy numbers to handle uncertainty in decision-making problems, the results will be fuzzy intervals where each element has a different grade of membership, and it is a challenging task to discriminate them. One way to handle this is to defuzzify the fuzzy intervals and use the corresponding ordering.

There are several research articles on ranking fuzzy numbers using different concepts proposed by various researchers. Still, it is challenging for many, as fuzzy numbers are represented by possibility distributions that can overlap with others thus, making it difficult for ordering. Bortolan and Degani [6] reviewed several methods for ranking fuzzy numbers on the unit interval and pointed out that the best indexes are the dominance indexes proposed by Dubois and Prade [4] for ranking of fuzzy numbers. Ranking fuzzy numbers using centroids was first proposed by Yager [14], Choobineh and Li [5] proposed an index for the ordering of fuzzy numbers that do not require normal or convex property of membership function, and they compared this method with that of Yager method [14]. Later on, methods based on the distance between centroids point to a fuzzy number and origin by Cheng [1], area between centroids of a

In adhesively bonded metallic structures, the oxide layer is a primary component of the micro-composite layer at the adhesive/adherend interface whose morphology plays a critical role in the strength and durability of the joint. The role of the oxide layer in detecting the level of adhesion in bonded aluminum joints is examined in the present work through the dispersion spectrum of ultrasonic true guided waves. The dispersion curves are calculated for an aluminum/epoxy/aluminum sample, where the adhesion between the epoxy and aluminum is modelled by a spring-mass model at both the interfaces. The variation in the ratio of the thickness of oxide to the primer layer is incorporated into the mass term of the model and its effect on the dispersion curves is studied. It is observed that adhesive-adherend interlayer thickness influences the higher-order symmetric modes at higher phase velocities and this influence is heavily dependent on the effective material properties of this interlayer.

1. Introduction

Adhesively bonded joints are an increasing alternative to mechanical joints in engineering applications due to their potential advantages such as light weight, uniform stress distribution along the bonded area and ability to bond dissimilar materials with different coefficients of thermal expansion [1]. Gauthier et al. [2] observe that the bonding methodology is still hindered by the lack of an efficient non-destructive technique for certifying the quality of an adhesive bond. They further point out that the development of non-destructive methods is essential for the condition assessment and maintenance of the bonded structures [3]. Castaings [4] points out that among all the existing Non-Destructive Testing (NDT) techniques used to inspect adhesive bonds, ultrasound-based methods are promising as they can mechanically interrogate the bonded joints. However, Siryabe et al. [5] observe that one of the industry challenges lies in linking the measured ultrasonics data with the mechanical strength of the bond, and, for this an appropriate model is needed for inversion. Rose [6] says that, in the development of any ultrasonic guided wave inspection system, computation plays a critical role and firstly phase and group velocity dispersion curves must be calculated for the particular waveguide structure being considered. The present work analyzes guided wave propagation in an adhesively bonded three-layer configuration through the phase velocity dispersion spectrum for possible weakness detection between the adhesive and adherend.

A typical adhesive joint consists of the adherends, the adhesive layer and the two interphase layers between the adhesive and the adherend. The specific defects that can occur in the joint can be mainly either cohesive or interfacial. Cohesive defects cause degradation of the adhesive and can be attributed to cracks, voids or porosity within the adhesive layer or curing errors. Interfacial defects result in a reduction of the strength of the bond between the adhesive and the adherend and can occur due to disbonds, weak adhesion or inappropriate surface treatment of the adherends. The mechanical integrity of the thin adhesive layers and interfaces play a major role in determining the serviceability of structures and their components. As pointed out earlier, the ultrasonic guided waves can be good candidates for testing the cohesive properties of the thin adhesive layer or the weak adhesion at each interlayer between it and the adherend. Various methods have been developed to investigate and understand the behavior of ultrasonic waves when propagating through adhesively bonded structures. However, Leiderman and Castello [7] point out that implementing a reliable ultrasonic non-destructive evaluation technique to determine the integrity of the thin adhesion interface is still an open issue.

In the literature, two basic rheological models - the cohesive model and the adhesive model - have been used to describe the behavior of the adhesive layer and the interface between it and the adherends. In the
