parallel processing saves time and further speeds up the detection of the attack. The proposed method is applied to the benchmark data set CICDDoS2019 for generating four different time series to detect TCP-based flooding attacks, namely TCP-SYN, TCP-SYN-ACK, TCP-ACK, and TCP-RST. The implementation results show that the proposed method can give a speedup of 2.3 times for processing attack traffic compared to sequential processing

I. Introduction

Denial of Service (DoS) attacks first appeared in the mid-1990s [1], as attacks stopping legitimate users from accessing specific services available on the Internet. DoS is an attack where a single system and single internet connection flood malicious requests to a targeted System to disrupt a legitimate user's connectivity by exhausting network bandwidth or exhausting the Server resources. Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) is a type of DoS attack where instead of using a single system, attackers use botnets(Devices which are compromised by a Trojan, etc.) and multiple internet connections to flood malicious requests for services. As this flood is from various devices, it becomes impossible to stop the attack by blocking its IP. Cyber criminals are taking advantage of the technological developments to carry out DDoS attacks. One such example is the rise of the Internet of Things in the recent past. It has given a fantastic opportunity for cyber criminals to create IoT based botnets[2] to carry out the DOS attacks. Many IoT devices are running with weak passwords and unpatched software, which quickly became a gold mine for cybercriminals to carry out malicious activities. Today hackers offer IoT-based botnets for lease, i.e., DDoS as a service at 7 dollars per hour, which has gone down from 25 dollars in 2017. These IoT based botnets have paved the way for powerful DDoS attacks with traffic rates exceeding 1Tbps. Even the big IT giants like Google, Amazon could not escape from these High-speed attacks.

Abstract

Recent technologies have a vast dynamic upgradation of technologies as the world is moving towards smart technologies, where the Internet of Things (smart) has entered into every area which became a part of top level sectors such as health care, manufacturing, electricity, agriculture and health. The smart technologies are playing a very crucial role in health sector with implementation of its need in different medical treatments. Many people are affected with voice disorder diseases due to their unawareness. Automatic speech linguistic recognizer (ASLR) contributes to the identification and diagnoses of the voice disorders from the speech signals retrieved from the smart sensors. Here we have proposed a model for automatic voice disorder identification where the voice signals are retrieved with smart sensors connected to the person, and these signals are processed by the ASLR in the cloud server where it will identify whether he is facing with any voice disorder and classification is then followed by the central server connected to the doctors where the complete manual treatment is replaced with automated technologies. The major contribution of this work is carried out in different stages from retrieval of voice signals with smart sensors and smart phones with applications, pre-processing of signals and feature extraction with MFCC-mel-frequency cepstral coefficients, automatic classification of signals with Gaussian mixture model (GMM) and medication communication with doctors and response to the patient.

Crop Recommendation System Using K-Nearest Neighbors Algorithm

M. Rekha Sundari, G. Siva Rama Krishna, V. Sai Naveen, and G. Bharathi

Abstract Agriculture is the most important sector of Indian Economy that has ever increasing demand due to tremendous raise in population growth. Lagging in agricultural prosperous is the major reason for Indian economical growth not reaching the expectations. This is due to increasing pressures from climate change, soil erosion, biodiversity, etc. To meet these challenges, advances in the field of agriculture are need of the hour. Success of farming venture depends upon selection of crops to be grown. Crop selection depends mainly on weather, soil conditions and past crop yield data. The major setback in Indian Agriculture is that, farmers do not select appropriate crop, they just follow the crop which was sown by their ancestors without understanding the way that yield is fortuitous, conditioning intensely upon the present-day climate, soil conditions. Updated technological traits of machine learning (ML) available in the literature, predicted crop yield production depending on the historical data and had not considered present conditions of weather and soil. The methods only depicted how algorithms can be used in recommendation of the crop but has not validated the efficiency of algorithms in performing the task. Our work concentrates on predicting the crop yield in the future accurately taking into account both past and present conditions by using simple yet strong k -nearest neighbor algorithm.

ABSTRACT

The growth kinetics of spirulina which would aid in design of photobioreactor is estimated in an open pond microcontroller based photobioreactor. The usage of microcontroller aids in controlled and increase in growth rate of spirulina compared to non-microcontroller. Using Arduino software, the outlet of CO₂ gas from open pond photobioreactor is estimated and the important parameters like growth rate and volumetric mass transfer coefficient are computed. These parameters help in design and increase in productivity of Spirulina. Initially the growth curve of Spirulina was studied in shaker flask which inferred the maximum growth of spirulina 2.64gm/L was obtained at 60 hours. Then the growth kinetics of Spirulina was studied using microcontroller based photobioreactor. The code was written in Arduino to automate the carbon dioxide outflow of the reactor. Initially the Arduino code was validated with the known concentrations of carbon dioxide and then it is used to measure output of photobioreactor. The net specific growth rate was estimated to be 0.005/hr which is higher than non-microcontroller based photobioreactor. The studies on variation of carbon dioxide with time is studied basing on dynamic gassing out technique. From this technique uptake rate of carbon dioxide and volumetric mass transfer coefficient are estimated to be 98.646 mg/ L/hr and 39.248/hr respectively. The values estimated aid in design of photobioreactor and increase in productivity of Spirulina.

INTRODUCTION

The microscopic, filamentous prokaryote, Arthrospira (Spirulina), has been the subject of intense investigation mainly owing to its use as food, feed, dietary supplement, and functional food [1]. Spirulina is a multicellular, filamentous cyanobacterium. On microscopic observations it appears as blue green filaments composed of cylindrical shells arranged in unbranched trichomes characterized by helical shape. In its commercial use, the common name, Spirulina, refers to the dried biomass of the cyanobacterium, Arthrospira platensis, and is a whole product of biological origin.

Arthrospira (Spirulina) species show great plasticity in morphology [4]. This is attributed to environmental factors like temperature and other physical and chemical factors and possibly also due to genetic change. In nature and in culture, Arthrospira forms helical trichomes of varying size and degree of coiling from tightly coiled morphology to an even straight uncoiled form. The trichomes in Arthrospira species show distinct transverse cross-walls under the light microscope. The filaments are solitary and reproduce by binary fission. The cells of the trichomes are broader than long and the width can vary from 3 to 12 μm though it can reach 16 μm occasionally. The cell organization is that of a typical prokaryote with a lack of membrane-bound organelles.

ABSTRACT

In recent years waste has become a major concern due to its impact on environment. A study on the utilization of chitosan (prawn shells waste) in the treatment of industrial/domestic waste waters to remove copper ions was done and the adsorption parameters were optimized using Design of Experiments (DoE). Using chitosan extracted from prawn shell waste, adsorption of copper ions was performed. For 200g of prawn shell waste 27.75% (55.5g) of chitosan was extracted. The extracted chitosan was used as a potential adsorbent besides its wide range of applications in the treatment of waste water. From the experimentation, it was observed that, an increase in dosage of adsorbent (fine sized) till 2g by agitating the stock solution for 60min at 9.3 pH, room temperature (25°C) results in 64.1% adsorption. Freundlich isotherm best fits the data and physisorption is observed. % adsorption increases with increase in dosage of adsorbent, decrease in temperature of stock solution, fine size of adsorbent providing more surface area. Throughout the experimentation, 0.001N of copper solution is maintained (as per the permissible limits set by USEPA). The obtained optimum values from the experimentation were well matched with the data obtained from RSM (DoE) with a correlation coefficient of 0.995.

INTRODUCTION

Sewages from industries, agriculture or from households generate high volumes of waste waters containing inorganic and organic compounds. These waste waters are to be treated with either physical, mechanical, chemical, and biological methods with various technologies like adsorption, filtration, biodegradation, oxidation and reduction, UV irradiation and coagulation/flocculation. The present study involves the removal of heavy metal impurities like copper from waste waters. Copper being the most consumed industrial metal in the world, it is found in natural minerals and is also commercially produced by smelting, leaching and in many unit operations and processes. Copper is widely used in the making of jewellery, home services, gun metals, American coins, used as a fungicide, anti bio-fouling, anti microbial. Even though copper is vital to humans, plants and animals it does cause some adverse effects when present in large quantities than required. Excess intake of copper does cause effects like nausea, diarrhea, tissue injury and disease, toxicity in excess ingestion cases. According to the United State Environmental Protection Agency, the permissible limit of copper is 1.3mg/l in drinking water and 1.9mg/l in industrial waste water. Adsorption technique was opted in this study to remove the copper ions from effluents. Batch studies were performed using chitosan as an adsorbent. Chitosan is one of the polymers that have its application in wastewater treatment for the removal of dyes and heavy metal ions. Chitosan can be obtained from shrimp, crab, krill shells, etc. In this study, prawn shells were used as a source for extracting chitin from which chitosan can be derived. In general chitin is used as a flocculating agent and also in the manufacture of cosmetics, paper industry, textile industry, photography and pharmaceuticals. It is a linear polyamine, bio compatible, bio degradable, non-toxic, anti tumour, anti cholesteremic. Benhabiles.M.S [et al] [1] performed his research on the anti bacterial activity of chitin, chitosan which is prepared from shrimp shell waste. Feng. Chinwu
